Alpine skiing first appeared at the Arctic Winter Games in 1972, but did not reappear again until 1994. Since then the event has been included at the 1996, 2000 and 2002 Games. The exclusion of alpine skiing from so many Games is explained by the lack of facilities in some host communities.

Alpine skiing competition at the 2004 Arctic Winter Games will include male and female categories in Super G, giant slalom and dual slalom events. Competition follows the rules of the International Ski Federation.

For thousands of years, the Inuit have fused games to hone physical abilities that are vital to their collective survival. Strength, endurance, accuracy, resistance to pain, and the spirit of cooperation are the qualities that define Arctic Sports. Surprisingly, Arctic Sports were not included at the Arctic Winter Games until 1974.

Competition typically features open and junior categories for both males and females. However the airplane, knuckle hop and head pull events are male-only. Other events include the Alaskan high kick, one-foot high kick, kneel jump, arm pull, one-hand reach, sledge jump, triple jump and two-foot high kick.

Competition in Arctic Sports events follow rules developed by the Arctic Winter Games International Committee.

These events, some of the most interesting and appealing to spectators are sponsored by Suncor Energy and the Athabasca Tribal Council.

Badminton

Badminton is one of only six sports included at every Arctic Winter Games.

The sport is popular in communities across the northern circumpolar regions because it requires only two people and can be enjoyed in the comfort of warm sports halls while winter holds the outdoors in its long, frozen grip. Few other sports at the Arctic Winter Games demand more of an athlete in terms of agility and endurance.

Badminton originated from a very old children's game known as Battledore (Paddle) and Shuttlecock (bird) in which the object was to keep the bird in the air as long as possible.

Basketball has been included in every Arctic Winter Games except for the 1984 Games in Yellowknife. Competition at the Games typically includes both junior male and junior female categories.

Team Alaska has historically dominated the competitions at the Arctic Winter Games, but a rule change requiring Alaskan players to be several years younger than their opponents now makes competition more balanced and exciting.

Given the popularity of basketball in Fort McMurray and the excitement of top-notch teams, we are sure to have stands filled with boisterous spectators.

Coca-Cola is the official sponsor of basketball competition at this year's Arctic Winter Games.

Biathlon

Biathlon, or ski biathlon, is a grueling sport with origins in the hunting and trapping traditions of the northern wilderness.

Biathlon competition at the Arctic Winter Games typically includes individual and relay events for both males and females. In biathlon, competitors must ski a set distance before entering a shooting range where they fire at five targets 50 metres away. Junior competitors do not carry their rifles when they ski.

Cross-country skiing has been a part of the Arctic Winter Games from the beginning, and it is one of the most competitive sports. Former Arctic Winter Games Team Yukon athlete, Lucy Steele, competed for Team Canada at the 1992 Olympic Games.

Cross-country skiing is the grandparent of all skiing sports. With skis found in Sweden that are some 4,500 years old, cross-country skiing is actually 4,250 years older than other forms of skiing.

One of Canada's most popular sports, curling has been an Arctic Winter Games staple since the Games began.

Requiring only four participants per team, curling has become a very popular sport in the circumpolar area and has resulted in the creation of some very competitive leagues throughout northern Canada and other northern regions.

Following the rules of the World Curling Federation, junior male and female athletes will compete for 2004 Arctic Winter Games dominance of the ice at the C.A. Knight Recreation Centre in Fort McMurray.

With Team Alberta North capturing two gold medals at previous Games, and teams NWT and Alaska capturing one silver and bronze each, the competition at the 2004 Arctic Winter Games promises to be exciting and entertaining.

As the name suggests, Dene Games were developed among Athapaskan-speaking aboriginals who have traditionally populated the sub-arctic areas of North America. These games evolved as a way for members of highly communal and nomadic societies to hone their skills for survival in what is an unforgiving environment.

Dene Games were added to the Arctic Winter Games in 1990 in an effort to increase the participation of Yukon and Northern Alberta First Nation and Metis people, who have no cultural ties to Arctic sports. They are also among the few events at the Arctic Winter Games that are open to adult competitors. Competition in the Dene Games events follows rules developed by the Arctic Winter Games International Committee.

The Dene Games will include the finger pull, hand game, snowsnake, stick pull and pole push.

These exciting games are sponsored by Suncor Energy and the Athabasca Tribal Council.

For more than 4,000 years the combination of dog and sled has been an important mode of transportation for inhabitants of the northern circumpolar region. The sled dog's ability to withstand sub-zero temperatures and pull heavy loads over frozen ground made it the perfect vehicle for vast journeys in search of food.

Dog mushing was first included in the Arctic Winter Games in 1990 and has appeared at every event since. This year's Games will once again include both male and female competitors. Depending on the age category, races are from 7.5 to 13 kilometres in distance, with each competitor using a team of between four and seven dogs to pull his or her sled.

The races will be tight this year between teams from NWT, Yukon and Alaska. At the 2002 Games, these teams won six, six and five medals respectively.

The dog mushing events are sponsored by Transwest Mining Systems.

It is usually a female-only event featuring competition in both short and long programs.

Depending on where the Arctic Winter Games is being held, competition follows the rules of either the Canadian Figure Skating Association or the United States Figure Skating Association, therefore, this year's events will follow the Canadian regulations.

For more information about figure skating: www.isu.org

Gymnastics

In this female-only event, participants compete against one another individually and in teams.

An Arctic Winter Games event since 1980, competitors' skills are tested on four events, including floor exercises, balance beam, the vault and the uneven bars. An all-round popular sporting event, the gymnastics competition is sure to be a crowd-pleaser. Catch the exciting gymnastic action to see whether the 2002 Arctic Winter Games gold medal champions, Team Alberta North, can hold off challenges from other delegations, including Team Alaska and Team Yukon.

It would be difficult to find a community in northern Canada or Alaska that does not have a hockey rink of one description or another. It would be equally difficult, given the sport's widespread following, to imagine the Arctic Winter Games without hockey. Every Arctic Winter Games has included a hockey event, and a few of these events have even witnessed the play of future NHL draftees and players.

Due in part to the parity among hockey teams in the Arctic Winter Games, this sport is a perennial favourite among spectators. It is also one of the biggest sports in terms of unit participation. Up to 20 per cent of each contingent consists of hockey participants, and almost every contingent has hockey teams in at least two categories.

Indoor Soccer

C.A. Knight Recreation Centre

Indoor soccer is one of the most popular events in the North.

The early Inuit in Alaska and Canada played "aqsaqtuk", or soccer on ice. Balls were stuffed with grass, caribou hair and moss. One legend tells of a game involving two villages with goals 10 miles apart! Luckily, these villages now have gyms for adults and youth alike to play indoor soccer.

Indoor soccer has been included at every Arctic Winter Games since 1980. The indoor soccer competition at the Games typically includes junior and juvenile categories for both males and females, and for the first time, intermediate females in 2004.

This sport is one of the fastest and most aggressive contests at the Games with five-member teams playing two 20-minute halves.

In 1929 M.J. "Jack" Burchett cut out a plank of plywood and secured his feet to it with clothesline and horse reins, and the first snowboard-like invention was born. It took some 30 years until the next step was taken. An eighth grade student by the name of Tom Sims designed a "skiboard" for a class project, and two years later Sherman Poppen invented a "Snurfer" by bolting two skis together.

From these modest beginnings the sport of snowboarding has grown in popularity, to the point where the sport was introduced to the Winter Olympic Games in 1998.

Snowboarding was included in the Arctic Winter Games for the first time in 2000. Events include giant slalom, boardercross, and slopestyle.

Snowshoe Biathlon

Like ski biathlon, snowshoe biathlon is a gruelling sport with origins in the hunting and trapping traditions of the northern wilderness.

Snowshoe biathlon competition at the Arctic Winter Games typically includes individual and relay events in junior and open categories for both males and females. In snowshoe biathlon, competitors must snowshoe a set distance before entering a shooting range where they fire at five targets 50 metres away. Junior competitors do not carry their rifles when they snowshoe.

Snowshoeing is a sport that demands very little in terms of equipment, but a great deal in terms of athletic ability.

A snowshoeing competitor is nothing without strength, endurance and determination. These qualities are the modern snowshoe racer's key to victory, just as they were once the arctic hunter's vital tools in the quest for survival.

Similar to middle distance running, there are a number of individual competitions where each person races against the clock. Snowshoes can be no longer than 32 inches in length and no wider than 8.5 inches. Other than snowshoes, no equipment is required.

The Stewart Weir Group is the proud sponsor of this competition.

For as long as there have been skates, there have been people who liked to skate fast.

Speed skating was actually the first of the three skating sports to develop into a competitive sport. Simply put, it is racing on ice. There are three basic types of competitions in speed skating: Olympic style (double lane), mass start (outdoor and indoor) and I.S.U. short track.

Short track competition takes place on a 111.12-metre oval inside an arena. It is very exciting to watch as races of four and six skilled skaters make passes and show adept strategy in a confined area.

After short-track speed skating was introduced as a demonstration sport at the 1988 Calgary Winter Olympics and became a full Olympic sport in 1992, the sport's popularity began to grow. This trend did not go unnoticed by the Arctic Winter Games. Short track replaced long track in 1988 and has been a highlight of every Arctic Winter Games since that time.
